Two abandoned gas stations were located along the highway at the entrance to the new Nooderpark, which was created by fusing together several green areas in Amsterdam North. Instead of demolishing these derelict buildings, the decision was made to take advantage of the open, flat roofs typical of such structures and recycle them to create a new covered public square. Colorful light installations placed under the roofs recall the changing Dutch sky and transform the gas stations into a luminous landmark that can be appreciated by people driving by, cycling or spending time in the park.
